

The 7 Commandments of ADHD Systems

Most ADHD routines aren't designed badly. They're designed for the version of you who slept 8 hours, had coffee, and felt like a functional human. That version of you is not the one who needs the system. These 7 commandments are the exact questions I use both with myself and my coaching clients.

- ✓ Run any new system through the first 5 to make sure they're ADHD-proof.
- ✓ The last two are for systems you already have in place but need to audit.

1 Does it work on my worst day?

If it needs you at 100%, it's not a system. It's a hope. Build for your worst day.

2 Can I see it without looking for it?

If you have to open something to see it, it doesn't exist. Out of sight = out of existence.

3 Does it live in one place?

Every extra place is another decision. ADHD brains have a decision budget. One home.

4 What's the smallest version that still counts?

Cut it in half. Then in half again. The smallest version that still counts IS the version.

5 What's my re-entry point?

You will fall off. The question is whether you have a way back in. Decide it before you fall.

6 When's the last time this actually helped me?

If you can't answer that, it's either too complicated or it's already run its course.

7 Is this shiny object syndrome or a real failure?

Novelty-seeking applies to systems too. Before you abandon it, ask: did the current system stop working or am I bored?

Get the full system in my new workbook:

Manipulating Myself to Do Stuff with 20+ worksheets inside!

GET THE WORKBOOK →